Exclusive: Energy Secretary Chu Calls for Extension of 1603 Cash Grants

In a conference call on Wednesday Energy Secretary Steven Chu said the Obama administration supports the extension of key stimulus-funded renewable energy subsidy programs, including the very popular 1603 cash grants.

The grants are “were widely popular,” Chu says in a conference call with cleantech and renewable energy business executives. “Ideally we would like to see those [grants] extended...” he adds. Kleiner Perkins Caufield & Byers’s John Doerr joined Chu in the call.

Over the past year the Treasury Department, which administers the 1603 grant program, has distributed more than $5.2 billion in grants, of that wind farms picked up $4.4 billion. The funding supports up to 30 percent of a renewable energy project’s total cost. The grants are expected to end at the end of the year.

Chu concedes that with ongoing concern in Congress about the federal deficit, extending the 1603 grants will be challenging. “Congress is worried about deficit spending but these [grants] programs have been successful and if choices have to be made, these are good choices to make,” Chu says.

So far the DOE has allocated nearly all of the (99.9 percent, according to Chu) stimulus funds. The stimulus programs is expected to double the country’s renewable energy capacity by 2012, Chu adds.

On the Renewable Electricity Standard (RES), Chu says a federal standard would help prop-up the deployment of renewable energy and cleantech.

Over the coming year, Chu says the DOE will continue to support Carbon Capture and Storage (CCS) projects, including the FutureGen initiative for which the DOE has committed $1 billion. The DOE also plans to support efforts that seek to significantly cut the costs of photovoltaic solar power, at price levels, Chu said, that are “well ahead of industry expectation.”

Steven Chu - Energy Secretary

After the first paragraph, the information presented was extracted from a number of emails that I sent out over the last year concerning McKinsey and Company. I think this corporation should be investigated for racketeering, un-American activities, subversion of the U.S. economy and possibly treason on the part of the Americans employed by this firm. That might sound strong - but I don't care. This corporation is bad news.

This morning I'm watching a press conference by Energy Secretary Steven Chu. The upper corner of the C-Span screen says that it was broadcast on Thursday. Chu is giving his plans for the (non) energy system of the United States. He announced "that he is naming Matt Rogers as Senior Advisor to implement these reforms and the investments in the President's American Recovery and Reinvestment Act. Rogers, formerly a senior partner of McKinsey and Company, has more than 20 years of experience in working with the energy industry and has done extensive work on the economics of addressing the global climate crisis.

<http://www.energy.gov/news2009/6934.htm>

What their plans are is to squeeze the energy consumers by implementing energy systems that supposedly are "free" but the free energy will cost us a fortune. For example, I read a statistic that in order for New York City to get enough wind power to provide electricity for the city, you'd have to cover the entire state of Connecticut with windmills. But - because wind power is not reliable, you still need back up power systems.

This whole concept of restricting energy is like cutting off the life's blood to the economy. I just got a utility bill for a place in which I'm not living - and I had the temperature set at 55 degrees for the entire time. The bill was $100.00 for the month - and that power is hydroelectric - the cheapest source of power available.

Precisely what is the point of restricting energy to our economy? Ask yourself that question. If the government wanted to provide stimulus to the economy, why wouldn't they do everything possible - including providing cheap energy? Cheap and plentiful energy would benefit everybody - rich, poor, businesses, EVERYBODY.

France is covered with nuclear power plants. Why don't we have them? Despite the Bullsh*t that nuclear is expensive, it really isn't once the facility is built. It's only expensive because greed is acceptable in this country and it's killing this country.

A couple of months ago, I sent out an email on McKinsey and Company. Where ever their consultants go, bankruptcies and destruction ensue. McKinsey and Company is a trojan horse corporation working for the COMMUNIST world governing system.

Recall that Jeff Skilling brought down Enron. Jeff Skilling was a consultant for McKinsey and Company before going to Enron.

There should be an investigation of McKinsey and Company to see how many corporations they've brought down. Also, since the Managing Partner of McKinsey is British, there should be an investigation of the link between oil market manipulation that was occurring out of London; with Cantor Fitzgerald - also a British corporation - their cap and trade system and eSpeed energy trading system.

What I was looking for was information on McKinsey & Company because I knew I'd looked at them before because of their links to Enron and a string of other now defunct American corporations.

In one of the links I found today on McKinsey was an interview with Richard Foster that included a picture with the caption "Dare to Destroy":

I had to recover it from the internet archives so it's in a pdf.

http://www.channelingreality.com/Documents/McKinsey\_Destroyer\_All.pdf

Feeding the Flames

What every manager needs to know about creative destruction. An interview with McKinsey's Richard Foster.

Russ Mitchell 05/01/2001 issue

Plenty of management quacks have written shelves of buzzwordy books containing nary a lick of research to back up their pontifications. Richard Foster is not one of them. A well-schooled engineer and scientist (he has two patents related to plasma catalysis), he bases most of his management theories on a database of more than 1,000 companies in 15 industries tracked over almost four decades.

Known as the McKinsey Corporate Performance Database, it follows the performance of mostly U.S.-based companies and the stock markets. Foster, a longtime senior partner and director with consultancy McKinsey & Co., says the database "mimics the real economy with exceptional fidelity."

He reveals his findings in a new book. The title is a lengthy one: Creative Destruction: Why Companies That Are Built to Last Underperform the Market-And How to Successfully Transform

Them. Thankfully, the prose is concise and the message is clear: Companies need to get a lot better at innovating, and they've got to get a lot more committed to destroying what doesn't work to clear the ground for the stuff that does. The book owes its inspiration to the late, great, but relatively unknown economist Joseph Schumpeter, who described the inevitable process of entrepreneurial capitalism as "the gales of creative destruction."

What he is talking about is destroying businesses in the United States. The clear message is "either outsource and join a supply chain - or die".

The reason that interview grabbed me - besides the obvious meltdown of our economy and trail of broken and bankrupt corporations left in McKinsey's wake, and because Joseph Schumpeter was a socialist, is because McKinsey's methodology is the very same methodology that was used by the U.S. government - OSS - to determine which of Germany's factories should be bombed in WWII to destroy their productive capacity:

http://www.channelingreality.com/NWO\_WTO/charlatans.htm

Lubin had authorized BLS to create a small research unit at Harvard University in 1941; the unit, under the direction of Wassili Leontief, constructed the first official input-output table.<sup>23</sup> Leontief's new technique employed a system of double entry bookkeeping that tabulated the transactions of any one transactor group industry with all other groups. It included the flow of intermediate as well as final output.

The technique had proved useful to the Office of Strategic Services during the war, helping to pinpoint bombing targets of those German industries crucial to the war effort. Its earliest domestic application had been an estimate made in 1944 for the Planning Division of the War Production Board.<sup>24</sup> "

And McKinsey is using it to destroy our productive capacity. And it is economic warfare.

Here is the Tides Foundation - give it a couple of minutes to paint the screen because it's loaded.

A couple of weeks ago I sent out an email about McKinsey & Company. My impression after a couple of observations - plus an article that I found that was an interview with the CEO or Chairman - whatever... was that they were a trojan horse corporation. Where ever their consultants were hired, the corporation soon after fell - bankrupt, ruined.

Tonight I was looking at the Tides Foundation on the DiscoverTheNetworks website. I ended up looking at a Group of Groups - the Democracy Alliance.

In 2006 a San Francisco, CA, office was established by the Democracy Alliance at the Presidio in the Tides Center, where Alliance member Drummond Pike has his office.

Rob McKay of the McKay Foundation and Anna Burger of SEIU are the elected chair and vice chair of the board of directors of the Democracy Alliance. [2]

"Members of the Democracy Alliance include billionaires like George Soros and his son Jonathan Soros, former Rockefeller Family Fund president Anne Bartley, San Francisco Bay Area donors Susie Tompkins Buell and Mark Buell, Hollywood director Rob Reiner, Taco Bell heir Rob McKay ... as well as New York financiers like Steven Gluckstern."

To stabilize the organization internally after almost a year of early stumbles, the partners chose as its managing director Judy Wade, a member of the elite firm McKinsey & Company, consultants to multinational corporations

The following is the email that pertains to McKinsey and below that is a link to another article on Corrupt Consultants - McKinsey's name appears in that one as well.

Is There a Culture of Corruption at McKinsey?

On Thursday March 10, 2011, 4:45 pm EST

The revelation that there may have been a "third man" at McKinsey with connections to the alleged insider trading schemes of Galleon founder Raj Rajaratnam casts a shadow across the reputation of the famous consulting firm. How deep does the corruption run?

If the allegations by the Securities and Exchange Commission against former Galleon chief Rajat Gupta are true, we know that McKinsey was lead by a man who was willing to betray the very corporations who had entrusted him to sit on their board of directors. It would mean that for nearly a decade McKinsey was led by a deeply corrupt man.

Another former McKinsey partner, Anil Kumar, has already pleaded guilty to passing information to Rajaratnam in return for bribes.

Now a third man has been brought into the mix. Kara Scannell of the Financial Times reports:

Jonathan Streeter, a federal prosecutor, told the jury that they would hear a recording of a phone conversation Mr Rajaratnam had with his brother "talking about plotting to get inside information from a consultant at McKinsey". He said Mr Rajaratnam tried to get the person, described by the hedge fund trader as "dirty", to "play ball" by possibly placing the person's wife on the Galleon payroll.

Clients of McKinsey have to be wondering if the famous consulting firm has devolved into a snakepit.

"Three McKinsey consultants all channeling confidential information to a single hedge-fund manager who wasn't even a client? That's not bad apples, it's a culture of corruption. At this point it's unimaginable that it wasn't happening elsewhere as well," Felix Salmon writes.

John Gapper at the Financial Times warns that "McKinsey now faces a crisis of corporate reputation which it needs to address in order to avoid its brand being badly tarnished."

It may seem extreme to draw conclusions about an entire firm from the actions a few individuals. But it's not. Individuals at the top set the tone and establish the culture of a firm. When they are morally compromised, the ethics of the firm rot. Far more than any regulation or official supervision from government authorities-it's the ethics embodied by a firm's leadership that will determine whether the firm as a whole is ethical.

Take Lehman Brothers. It's more than apparent that the personal character of Dick Fuld had a lot to do with the shenanigans that helped accelerate that firm's demise. And Fuld's dishonesty was apparent early on. According to former executives, back when Lehman was owned by American Express, the bond traders were required to report their daily profits and losses to the "upstairs" management.

Afraid that the American Express executives would become aware of how much risk the traders were taking, the traders started fudging the numbers. On days they made a lot of money, they didn't report all of it. On days when they lost money, they concealed the losses with the unreported profits from the prior day. It made the daily profits and losses look smooth. They called it "Dick's Reserve."

Is it any wonder that decades later, Lehman executives would be discovered to have used accounting gimmicks to make the firm's balance sheet look healthier than it was?

Gupta's lawyer says he hasn't done anything wrong. Rajaratnam pleaded innocent of the charges against him. We don't know who this "third man" is.

But right now, McKinsey is looking very, very bad. If the corruption started at the top, it's a good bet it spread throughout the firm.

http://www.h1bvisasucks.com/H1BDiscussions\_issue\_bush.htm

I can smell McKinsey and Company clear out here in Idaho. They stink worse than 2 week old fish. The entire plan for U.S. non-energy stinks.... is anybody paying attention? Or are we just going to lay down and allow these COMMUNISTS to gut our economy and our country. Who will benefit most when the U.S. declines to the third world? How about the European Union?
